Are You Driving in Your Lane?

June marks the halfway point for your year. You may stop and wonder "where did the time go?"

To reach your destination, it is very important to focus and actively engaged in what you do best.

You may stop and ask yourself "what do I do best?"

To answer your question, think of what you do best with the least amount of effort. Think about what you do best that comes easy for you without leaving you mentally or physically exhausted. Think about what excites you and puts a smile on your face as you creatively plan an event or occasion.

Now that the light bulb has finally come on in your amazing brain, are you mentally and physically driving in your lane doing what you do best?

Often times you may feel what you do has little value because it comes easy for you and does not feel or look like work. Now let me remind you that many success stories share the fact that inventors, educators, architects, actors, writers, electricians, and more continue long hours without thinking about the time because they get lost in their creativity and passion which comes so effortlessly that time flies.

Your challenge today is to recognize and appreciate your gift and value. When you do not see or recognize your value, you will find yourself drifting into someone else's lane trying to be like your friend or favorite star. As a result, you will find yourself setting unrealistic goals because you will be imitating a vision that belongs to another. This will be very obvious and cause others to quickly lose interest because of your lack of authentic enthusiasm and positive energy.

In closing, I challenge you to look deep within to discover your unique talent which will keep you focused and driving in your own lane.

The end result will be room for all as we stay in our individual lines allowing others to reach their destination without a mental or physical collision.

The great news is that you are growing comparing yourself only with your performance yesterday, last week, last month, and last year as you reach your final destination.
